

Rep. Mike Thompson: “An overwhelming majority of Americans agree that if you’re too dangerous to fly, you’re too dangerous to buy a gun. Congress has a responsibility to listen to the will of the people, put partisan politics aside and do what it takes to help keep Americans safe by making sure suspected terrorists don’t have easy access to guns. And that’s what this bipartisan, commonsense legislation is all about.”

Rep. Robin Kelly: “Common sense gun violence prevention has been my top priority since being elected to Congress. I am pleased that a handful of brave and honorable Republican colleagues have taken a stand and reached out to work with Democrats on the simplest of measures: keeping guns away from terrorists. The last two days have been a watershed moment. I truly hope that the leadership of Senator Collins is the beginning of bipartisanship in addressing our nation’s gun violence epidemic. This is a problem we can only solve by working together.”

Rep. John Carney: "Time and time again we’ve seen the price of inaction on gun control. We’ve seen countless mass shootings and lost the lives of loved ones across the country. The American people are frustrated, as are many of my colleagues here in Congress. I’m proud to help lead this bipartisan effort in the House. The only way we can take meaningful action, action that our constituents are urging us to take, is to work with both sides of the aisle. I hope we can continue to move forward on this common-sense measure to keep guns out of the hands of those wishing to do us harm."

Rep. Tulsi Gabbard: "We owe it to the American people to work together to try to get sensible gun control legislation actually passed—and in order to do that, it must be a bipartisan effort. Majorities in both parties agree with the vast majority of the American people—we need to keep guns out of the hands of terrorists. However, we must also ensure that any action we take does not compromise the rights to due process guaranteed to every citizen. There are valid constitutional concerns related to the lack of due process and transparency for those who have mistakenly been placed on the No Fly List and Terror Watch List. This legislation is a bipartisan compromise that will help to keep guns out of the hands of terrorists, while protecting our constitutionally-guaranteed civil liberties."
